

Do You Want To Be a Babysitter? Learn a Few Things First

For many young girls, it seems like a simple way to earn some pocket money. All you have to do is look after the neighbor's kid for a few hours on Friday night, and you are set for the weekend. In theory it sounds great, but in reality it may be more dangerous than you realize. Looking after a toddler is not quite as simple as it would seem. As long as everything is going smoothly, it's fine. But are you prepared for any eventuality? If something had to go wrong, your reactions could mean the difference between that baby's life or death. Of course, nobody would hold you responsible, but you would have to live with the fact that you may have been able to do something, and prevent tragedy. Firstly, gather some knowledge about handling babies in general. Your mother should be the perfect teacher. Simple things like how to remove a wind, or calm a crying baby, can make the difference between your job being a breeze, or a few hours of hell. You also have to learn the difference between uneasy crying, and a real problem. Next, gather some knowledge about basic first aid. Do you know what to do if someone chokes? Do you know what to do if a baby in your care got hurt? Some toddlers have the uncanny ability to attract accidents: If something should happen, you should know what to do, and not panic. Simple things like knocking over a cup of coffee can be much worse for such a young skin than it would affect you, so be prepared. Lastly, get to know more about the child or baby you will be responsible for. Since you are not a "grownup", it is likely that the limits of control will be tested. Be sure to know exactly what the expectations and rules are, so you will know when to stand your ground. Being a babysitter does not require a degree, but it does entail being responsible for a human life, albeit for a short period. Be sure you are ready for it.
