

Goal of nurturing the kidney and achieving male enhancement

In the long history of China up to the beginning of the 20th century there have been many dynasties, which rose and fell one after another. The officials of each dynasty generally spoke to the reigning emperor or said anything to other people about him by using the title of "Ten thousand years of life", while most other members of the royal family, including the queen and the emperor's mother, could only be addressed or referred to as "One thousand years of life". This usage or imperative rule showed how egoistic the emperors were and how much they emphasized good health and longevity. In order to enable the emperors to maintain optimum male sexuality and enjoy male enhancement and longevity the court physicians sought and researched incessantly for the most efficacious tonic for the male gender that could keep the body strong and in good condition. Such court recondite recipes for natural male enhancement became quite perfect in about the year 1700 during the Ming Dynasty.

In contrast to the hereditary rulers of most other countries, each emperor of past China kept harems in which lived countless consorts and concubines. One would wonder how the emperors were able to have the libido to deal with so many females. With regard to this question, it is noteworthy that a number of emperors of China failed to realize their wish to have a long life coupled with extensive sexual gratification. For instance, the famous emperor of the Tang dynasty, named Li Shimin, who unified China and distinguished himself by being reverently called Heavenly Khan by many other Asian rulers, wished to find the way to longevity. He sent a pious Buddhist monk to India for this purpose. The monk stayed in India for more than ten years and returned with the Buddhist scripture but no elixir of life. Nevertheless, the accomplishment of this Buddhist mission came to be considered a historic event in China and became the basis of the world-famous Chinese novel entitled Pilgrimage to the West, the fantastic stories of which fascinated people and were used as the themes of numerous cartoons and TV programs. As for the emperor, he died at the age of 50, perhaps harmed by the magical pellets which the alchemists had provided him with to increase his libido.

Cordycepin with Ginseng has the merit of increasing immunity against diseases and is particularly valuable in being very quick in enhancing male potency and enduring in this effect of natural male enhancement. It has no side effects and does not entail users' dependency on it.

It can strengthen the male psychic force and male reproductive system; conserve the cerebrum, repair and regenerate the brain cells, naturally improve memory; and radically enhance immunity so as to really attain the goal of nurturing the kidney and achieving male enhancement, invigorating the brain, enhancing male sexuality, retarding the aging process, prolonging life and boosting longevity.

About the Author

Related articles:

Herbs increase libido, natural male enhancement from China

History of Chinese herbs that can enhance and increase male libido increase libido

Health

Source: <http://www.eatsee.com>