

Four Ways of Identifying a Fake Online Pharmacy

If you've been reading up on online pharmacies (and if you're planning on using one, that's a good thing to do), you've probably found many articles that warn about fraudulent online pharmacies. These pharmacies either sell "drugs" that are really nothing but sugar pills, sell drugs that actually contain some harmful substances or aren't really that useful, or simply take your money and never send you anything. But how can you easily identify online pharmacies that are fakes? Well, a fraudulent online pharmacy that really wants to get your money will probably look so smooth that it's impossible to identify, but those are few and far between. Most fake pharmacies throw up a website that isn't as polished as it should be. Here are four ways of spotting a fake online pharmacy. First, the pharmacy does not require a prescription to purchase drugs. While that may be what many people are looking for in their online pharmacy, it's also something that many scam sites advertise. Yes, there are real online pharmacies that don't require prescriptions, but you have to be very careful here. Drawing in customers by claiming you don't need a prescription is a favorite ploy of scam sites because it so often works. Second, most scam sites don't waste time listing out drugs that aren't popular or that aren't good sellers. If you pull up an online pharmacy and only find that they sell weight-loss drugs, painkillers, and sex-related drugs like Viagra, be wary. These sites pick these types of drugs because they're what most people order online. Again, it's all about drawing in the most customers to scam. Third, the online pharmacy doesn't list any contact information or an address. If they do list a phone number or address and you're at all suspicious, check up on them. Often, scam sites claim to be located in Canada when they're actually not. If the phone number is not a working number or the address is registered to another business, don't use the online pharmacy. Fourth, don't ever use an online pharmacy that sends you spam email. This may sound like a no-brainer, but if they're sending you spam, it's a scam. Think of it this way: would your local grocery store or dry cleaner send you spam mail? Of course not. Legitimate online pharmacies do not send unsolicited email, so don't fall for any of these offers.
